The older cells pass through varying stages of fatty degeneration until they are forced from the month of the gland as sebum, a substance holding in suspension minute oil-globules. The sebaceous glands rest upon the erector papillae muscles, and are moved as the hairs move. No doubt the action of these muscles materially aids the ejection of the contents of the glands; vigorous brushing of the hair tends to increase the flow of this oily secretion. Sweat-Glands.--The other glands developed from the epithelium are the tubular sweat-glands. Their development does not differ materially from that of the sebaceous glands, except that instead of assuming a racemous form they curl or coil upon themselves at their deepest extremity, in a very peculiar manner, presenting the appearance of a ball (Fig. 308). Vol. I.--36 The epithelial...
