Excerpt: . . . in which the capitalists wealth may be invested--perhaps to proceed to personal outrage, and attack, on some fancied injury, even his life. The Irish farmer in many districts dare not adopt turnip husbandry; the starving peasantry would clear off his crop for their own consumption. He will not venture to plant; his trees would disappear as soon as they are fit for fuel. He must not fence his enclosures: the fences would be levelled by the first vagrant he sent unrelieved off his premises. If he lays out his stock in cattle, they are perhaps houghed from a similar motive. If he lays down a field to pasture, it is turned up by a hundred spades during the night; and he is commanded by Capt. Rock, under pain of death, to let it out in potato-patches! How is capital to grow in such an...
